

As the producer of an Internet radio show now heard in 40 countries, I can vouch for the fact that "traditional" radio is restrictive, and maybe in a sense monopolistic. I have been in radio in some capacity for over 35 years, and have seen the way that terrestrial radio firms have tried to strangle any and all opposition. They are seeing now that their method of programming doesn't give the audience what they want, and what they want is the variety that my show and others on the Internet or satellite provide. They fear losing what fading audience they still have, so the "big guns" will now try to squash the "little guys" like me by trying to control what we can play. Don't let that happen! Let the "major" stations try to compete with US for a change.
